Foreclosure Summons on deceased mother's house - Q&A - Avvo

If your mother was single, then you and your siblings as well as any surviving parents (if only one parent died), will receive your mother's assets. If no parents are alive, then the estate passes in equal shares to you and your siblings. If your mother was single with children, then the estate would pass in equal shares to the children.

In My Mother's House: Civil War in Sri Lanka - Zubaan

The author elegantly and movingly elicits stories from the survivors of the country's long civil war (in particular women). In doing so it offers a glimpse of those voices that have been silenced by the larger narrative and offers a much more complex picture of what it is to be a Tamil and a Tamil-speaking Muslim than anything offered by elites on either side of the cultural divide.

My Mother Died & Has No Will; What Do I Do Next ...

Self-dealing under a power of attorney is a clear violation of the fiduciary relationship. Many POA forms allow the principal to state whether self-gifting is permitted, but transferring major assets, such as a house, to your own account can be treated as felony theft under state laws. Since most principals are elderly, abuse is not always reported, and efforts are under way in many states to ...
