In California, where most of those strawberries are grown, 400 farmers depend on 55,000 farmworkers to work their fields, according to the California Strawberry Association, an industry group. (Florida is the country's second-largest strawberry state.) But harvesting strawberries is back-breaking work. As farm workers roll small carts between rows of plants, hunching over to pluck berries off the stems, they must intuitively understand which fruits are ready to be picked by sizing up ...
